

Front Edit Other
Page Page Page

Date: 100

Sexpionage

ALLEN Welsh Dulles, ex-chief of the Central Intelligence Agency and once billed as "America's master spy," has given some reassuring opinions on the Profumo affair in a television interview.

He said, "As long as there is sex, it is going to be used" in intelligence work. And: "I must say the question they (the Russians) apparently gave the young lady to ask, as to when the Germans were going to get the atomic bomb, was not a very penetrating intelligence question to ask."

If this is the true level of espionage in the scandal, then Miss Keeler and her cohorts in pleasure have been sadly frustrated in their designs, if not their desires. The Russians have simply got to ask better questions than that if sex is to remain one of their best not-so-secret spy weapons.

It is debatable if even Prime Minister Macmillan could tell Lady Dorothy when Germany is going to get the bomb. One thing is certain: There will always be an England and, if we interpret the fatalists Mr. Dulles, sexpionage will have a part in it.

100-00000

1 88480100